Vita Coco, based in New York, was founded by old friends Ira Liran, who lives in Brazil, and Michael Kirban, a Brooklyn-based software executive who served as the company's feet on the ground in the U.S.

- The company for some time now has been the clear market leader and, as the category has somewhat stalled, embarked on a vigorous bout of innovation inside and outside the coconut water category to stimulate faster growth and tempt an acquirer. The latter did not happen, so the company instead took advantage of hospitable public markets to launch an IPO that enabled some long-time investors, Verlinvest and Reignwood Group, to liquidate some of their shares while stoking the pump for continued expansion.
- As noted, a major portion of Vita Coco's funding had come from Verlinvest, the investment fund built on money from the Interbrew (Stella Artois) brewing fortune. Verlinvest had scored a notable success in an earlier investment in Vitaminwater marketer Glacéau and has invested in essence water marketer Hint and açai player Sambazon. As a family fund, it can take a more patient approach than conventional private equity providers, being under no pressure to find a lucrative exit for its investors. That proved a good thing, as Vita Coco's chances of an exit proved elusive, as has been the case with Hint, too.
- Another key investor has been the Chinese owner of Red Bull in that market, Reignwood Group, which invested about $167 million to acquire a 25% stake in Vita Coco, for an enterprise value estimated at $665 million. (Reflecting the stalled prospects of the category, that valuation had grown only to $774 million via the IPO, not a huge increment of value added over a seven-year period.) Reignwood, based in Beijing, also agreed to distribute the brand in China.
- Notably for startups in beverages, Kirban has been operating profitably for years, cutting his first dividend check to investors in 2016, thanks to taking a guerrilla approach to building the business. That record has somewhat shielded him from the plunge in share values of newly listed beverage companies as investors have soured at the growth-at-all-costs model and begun to demand signs of a pathway to profitability.
- In a coup in its earlier days that brought a wave of publicity and brand awareness, several celebrity consumers of the brand came aboard as investors, including pop icon Madonna, her manager Guy Oseary, actors Matthew McConaughey and Demi Moore, as well as Red Hot Chili Peppers frontman Anthony Kiedis.
