Overview & Issues (cont’d)

Despite lackluster performances by some large segments, others showed strength—especially bottled water and the separate but related value-added water category.

- Bottled water enlarged its lead over CSDs with volume growth of nearly 8%.
- Value-added water—water with a hint of flavor or some other sort of enhancement—grew even more vigorously, though volume remained considerably smaller.
- Coffee grew (and the small but vibrant RTD sub-segment remained strong).
- Distilled spirits grew again in 2018, when they once again ranked as the smallest category by volume but one of the biggest when measured in either wholesale or retail dollars, both of which grew more quickly than volume did.

In general, beverages that boasted some benefit beyond simple hydration performed well, while those perceived as unhealthful or mere empty calories struggled.

- Thus, value-added water and energy drinks handily outperformed the total beverage market due mainly to their functional properties.
- In contrast, regular CSDs lost traction. They managed sales growth in no small part to changes in package sizes. Increasingly common small units generally carry higher per-ounce pricing. A small sub-segment of premium or craft CSDs also emerged.
- Standard bottled water’s growth slowed in 2018 compared to the immediately preceding years, but the category’s versatility (and generally low pricing) assured its status atop the volume rankings.
- Beverages Marketing expects bottled water to remain the number-one beverage type by volume in the near future. By 2023, its volume could approach ___ gallons, which would work out to almost ___ gallons per person.
