A number of paradoxes can be observed at play in the emergence of these alternative styles of drinks. Not the least is the simultaneous yearning among consumers for what has been perceived as attractive qualities of beer, spirits and wine – complexity, say, and grown-up-ness – without what has generally been considered their sin qua non, i.e., alcohol.

- While traditionalists or the literal minded might scoff at the idea of alcohol-free “wine” (isn’t that just grape juice?), and connoisseurs of specific distilled spirits might turn up their noses at, say, “rum” or “gin” with little or no alcohol, less convention-bound consumers appear willing to embrace such seemingly unusual beverages. Wine without alcohol might not meet a strict definition of wine, but liquid made from grapes, put in glass bottles and intended to be consumed from standard wine glasses might offer something that grape juice poured from a carton does not, just as those who like the taste of gin and tonic or rum and Coke but don’t want to worry about driving home safely or about how they’ll feel in the morning might see real value in low octane spirits.

- Of course, not all niche and emerging styles of drinks considered here are low- or no-alcohol products. Many hard/spiked seltzers have an alcohol content comparable to conventional light beers. Yet even in this area, these can qualify as relatively low levels if the beverages are selected as alternatives to drinks made with distilled spirits. Suggested serving recommendations for these seltzers resemble those for no-alcohol seltzers, i.e. in a glass over ice. Thus, as a substitute for regular cocktails, hard seltzers do represent a lower-alcohol option. Some seltzers have been presented as precisely for such occasions, sometimes even using distilled spirits brand names (as with Svedka Spiked Premium Seltzer).

- Some – though by no means all – of the brands making up the “sports” beer category highlight their on-the-low-side alcohol content in order to play up their ability to hydrate active consumers. (In general, alcohol can contribute to dehydration, which makes beer an unlikely candidate for a rehydration beverage, but the lower the alcohol content, the less this is a problem.)

Another seeming contradiction is seeking healthier options among beverages required by law to bear health warnings on their labels. While this would not apply to truly alcohol-free products, of course, it would remain the case with those with the same alcohol content, and thus the same need to adhere to labeling rules, as beer.

- Making any sort of overt health claims for beverage alcohol has always been a tricky business.
