After two straight years of tepid growth, ready-to-drink (RTD) tea has performed more strongly for the past eight years.

- The late 1980s and early 1990s saw the explosion of premium hot-fill brands such as Snapple, which were packaged in glass bottles and sold one at a time in down-the-street outlets. The innovations of Snapple — still entirely relevant three decades later — included use of a wide-mouth 16-ounce glass bottle that until recently still was the default packaging choice for high-end beverage newcomers and an all-natural formulation that eschewed the use of preservatives in favor of pasteurization (the so-called hot-fill process).
- Arizona entered the category in 1992 and demonstrated the power of flashy packaging to develop consumer awareness and loyalty even in the absence of more formal marketing efforts.
- Snapple and Arizona's success drew entries from Coca-Cola (via a partnership with Nestlé under the Nestea brand) and PepsiCo (via a partnership with Lipton under that brand name) in the 1990s. Coca-Cola and PepsiCo were content to use a cold-fill (preservative) approach that traded off quality and taste in favor of economy and the ability to run the brands through their bottlers' conventional soft drink lines. These popular-priced, cold-fill brands (Nestea Cool and Lipton Brisk, respectively) — packaged in plastic bottles and cans — soon took the market lead from premium teas.
- After the initial push provided by Brisk and Cool, RTD tea started to cool. Since it shares a hydration function with water, RTD tea was one of the segments most negatively affected by the rapid advancement of retail PET water. In the late 1990s, hot-fill teas began to outperform cold-fill, popular teas — mostly because of the resurgence of Arizona.
- SoBe and Snapple attracted the attention of the major carbonated soft drink (CSD) companies, placing RTD tea at the vortex of consolidation trends. Under its new corporate master, SoBe has faded away in the RTD tea segment. For most of its tenure during Cadbury Schweppes (later, Dr Pepper Snapple), it can also be said that Snapple was mostly stagnant — although it showed signs of turning around in the new decade.
