One of the main dividing lines in the RTD tea industry was between hot-fill, premium teas and popular, cold-fill teas.

- The hot-fill teas enjoyed a perception of better taste and premium positioning while cold-fill teas enjoyed a price advantage and widespread availability. While cold-fill entries took over the lead in the 1990s, hot-fill brands regained the lead in the early 2000s.

- However, to this day, hot-fill products create expense and complexity that make them an uneasy fit with the established systems of the major soft drink marketers and their bottlers.

- By now, however, the big beverage companies are building in a substantial amount of their own hot-fill capacity and learning to adapt to the complexities of offering all-natural products as a greater part of their mix. Coca-Cola's ongoing refranchising of its bottling operations in North America reversed course from a requirement that the company retain control of all manufacturing, with a view of garnering greater economies on the hot-fill side, in favor of allowing the more-agile bottlers to continue to manage these operations.

- The distinction between glass and plastic started to wane when RTD tea marketers such as Snapple and AriZona and Coca-Cola began to use plastic packages for their hot-fill products. Plastic has several advantages — i.e., portability and unbreakability — vis-à-vis glass. That is not to say that glass was abandoned. Snapple continued to package most of its volume in glass even as it introduced plastic packages. However, Snapple recently introduced a new 16-ounce plastic bottle that has replaced its iconic 16-ounce glass bottle.

- AriZona had a healthy business in glass although a majority of its volume had migrated to plastic and other materials. What’s more, it has lessened greatly its reliance on glass after the introduction of a hot-fill plastic bottle created by Plastipak.

- Also, distinguishing what is premium and what is not is becoming more difficult. For example, AriZona was once classified as premium, but is now considered part of the regular RTD tea segment since many of its products — such as the gallon size — sport a relatively low unit price.

- Much of the recent backlash against plastic has not seeped into other beverage categories besides bottled water. The rationale appears to be, rightly or wrongly, that bottled water is not a “necessary” product. So it appears there won’t be an exodus in RTD tea from plastic to cans anytime soon.
