Whatever their enduring appeal, distilled spirits have some drawbacks – shortcomings that spirits related alternative adult beverages (AABs) endeavor to overcome.

- For some consumers, the effort required to prepare a cocktail is a nuisance, which creates an opening for ready-to-drink (RTD) cocktails.
- Consumers put off by the high calories of cocktails containing fruit juice or sugary syrups also might prefer iterations with fewer calories, which some AABs boast.
- Alcohol levels can also be an issue for some drinkers, who like the taste and complexity of cocktails but want a lower octane option. Some spirits makers highlight their canned drinks similarity to malt-based hard seltzers (as E. & J. Gallo did with High Noon) while other simply bill their RTD cocktails as cocktails or sparkling sodas (as Paris-based Pernod Ricard did with brands like Absolut and Jameson).

However, it would be a mistake to define RTD cocktails only in terms of what they are not. They are more than drinks with no assembly required or lower-alcohol alternatives to standard cocktails.

- Packaging matters: Aluminum cans, with their light weight and portability, afford usage occasions that drinks in highball glasses simply do not.
- Moreover, the proliferation of RTD cocktails bearing instantly-recognizable distilled spirits trademarks indicates distillers' confidence that consumers remain interested in distilled spirits, and that prepared cocktails may be the way to reach consumers who for some reason or another don't already imbibe the usual versions of those brands.
- Yet the use of the words hard seltzer on the labels of some of the brands discussed below also indicates an eagerness of distillers to get in on a trend spearheaded by purveyors of malt-based beverages.
- Even the companies that do not style their RTD cocktails as hard seltzer are trying to attract consumers by offering adult beverages with comparable characteristics.
