Traditionally, marketers of the major sports beverages rarely resorted to price promotions in their endless quests to gain, or maintain, market share.

- Marketers instead focused on new products and advertising to spur sales. Thanks to Gatorade, sports beverages are traditionally the most advertised New Age beverages.
- Further, as sports beverages were made available in outlets such as convenience stores and delis, companies were able to maintain premium pricing for their products.
- With the increased influence of mass merchandisers and club stores, sports drink pricing began to decline in the mid-2000s. Powerade performed strongly enough to stem significant price inflation in the overall market.
- In 2009, although Gatorade struggled, PepsiCo refused to cut its price, stating that such a move would cause consumers to doubt its functionality. However, price promotions continued to occur in the new decade, although not so much in the most recent years. Then, in 2021 and 2022, the U.S. economy experienced unusual inflation, which has enabled marketers to increase prices rapidly.
- In the years to 2026, sports drinks are expected to continue escaping the price prison, although not to the extent of 2021 and 2022. The emergence of premium sports drinks like BodyArmor has also conditioned the consumer mind to accept higher prices overall.
