Some specialty brewers have recognized that cans offer them some of the same advantages that they do for bigger brewers.

- Cans have some advantages over glass. They are lightweight and much less fragile than bottles, they chill faster, and they are less expensive to purchase, handle, store and ship.
- Additionally, cans can be used in places where glass is prohibited, including sports arenas, golf courses, beaches and parks. Indeed, Scott Maitland, founder of Top-of-the-Hill Restaurant and Brewery in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, specifically cited the inaccessibility of craft beer on the golf course as the reason his brewery began packaging beer in cans. Portland Brewery, which Pyramid Breweries acquired in 2004, supplies Alaska Airlines with cans of its MacTarnahan's Amber Ale. Before its demise, Stroh canned Augsburger for Northwest Airlines. Gambrinus used cans with its domestic brands in efforts to reach for the sky. Shiner Bock in cans was offered by American Airlines, and Pete's Wicked Ale in cans has been sold on Continental flights.
- Dale Katechis, founder of Lyons, Colorado-based Oskar Blues Brewery, decided to "kick holes in the can's lowly image by shoving big, beefy beers into them." Oskar Blues packages Dale's Pale Ale and Old Chub Scottish Ale in cans. Others such as New Belgium, Blue Sky Brewing, Brooklyn Brewery, New England Brewing and Sherwood Forest Brewers also offer their beers in cans.
- Many foodservice and institutional outlets prefer cans to bottles because they are easier to store, handle and dispose of. Opaque cans protect beer from ultraviolet light, which can cause chemical reactions that produce a "skunky" aroma.
- In order to stay competitive with imported brands, specialty brewers may feel pressure to include more cans in their packaging mix. Modelo Especial and Heineken Premium Light are among the prominent imported labels sporting aluminum cylinders. The latter first arrived in green glass; Heineken added 12-ounce slim cans in 2007.
- Fast-growing New Belgium joined the ranks of specialty brewers using aluminum packages by putting its Fat Tire brand in cans. When New Belgium introduced Shift in 2012, it put the lager in cans, too.
- In 2011, Colorado's Mobile Canning System developed a mobile canning line, allowing smaller brewers to put their beer in cans without investing in their own machinery. In 2013, Michigan Mobile Canning brought the idea to the Midwest, in the form of a 16-foot truck equipped with canning technology.
